AGREEMENT FOR PARENTS

Psychotherapy can be a very important resource for children of separation and divorce. Establishing a therapeutic alliance outside of the home can:

- Facilitate open and appropriate expression of the strong feelings which routinely accompany family transitions, including guilt, grief, anxiety, sadness, and anger.
- Provide an emotionally neutral setting in which children can explore these feelings.
- Help children understand and accept the new family composition and the plans for contact with each member of the family.
- Offer feedback to a child's caregivers based on knowledge of the child's specific emotional needs and developmental capacities.

However, the usefulness of such therapy is extremely limited when the therapy itself becomes simply another matter of dispute between parents. With this in mind, and in order to best help your child, your child's therapists strongly recommends that each of the child's caregivers (e.g., parents, stepparents, daycare workers, guardian ad litem [GAL]) mutually accept the following as requisites to participation in therapy.

- It is your child's therapist's primary responsibility to respond to your child's emotional needs. This includes, but is not limited to, contact with your child and each of their caregivers, and gathering information relevant to understanding your child's welfare and circumstances as perceived by important others (e.g., pediatrician, teachers). In some cases, this may include a recommendation that you consult with a physician, should matters of your child's physical health be relevant to this therapy.
- Your child's therapist asks that all caregivers remain in communication regarding this child's emotional well-being. Open communication about his or her emotional state and behavior is critical. In this regard, each of you is invited to initiate frequent and open exchange with your child's therapist.
- Your child's therapists asks that all parties recognize and, as necessary, reaffirm to the child, that the therapist is the child's helper and not allied with any disputing party.
- Your child's therapist strongly recommends that all caregivers involved choose to participate in psycho-educational groups in which separating and divorced parents learn basic strategies for conducting a divorce in the best interests of the child.
- Please be advised regarding the limits of confidentiality as it applies to psychotherapy with a child in these circumstances:

Counseling Associates will keep records of all contacts relevant to your child's well-being. These records will not be released to either parent without a court order unless the therapist agrees with both parents that it is in the child's best interest that these records be revealed. These records are subject to court subpoena and may, under some circumstances, be subpoenaed by parties to your divorce, including your attorneys.

Any matter brought to the attention of your child’s therapist by either parent regarding the child may be revealed to the other parent. Matters that are brought to the attention of your child’s therapist that are irrelevant to the child’s welfare may be kept in confidence. However, these matters may best be brought to the attention of others, such as attorneys, personal therapists, or counselors.

Your child’s therapist is legally obligated to bring any concern regarding the child’s health and safety to the attention of relevant authorities. When possible, should this necessity arise, your child’s therapist will advise all parties regarding the concerns.

- This psychotherapy will not yield recommendations about custody. In general, your child’s therapist recommends that parties who are disputing custody strongly consider participation in alternative forms of negotiation and conflict resolution, including mediation and custody evaluation, rather than try to setting a custody dispute in court.

Payment for services is due in full at the time of service, unless other specific arrangements have been agreed upon. Any outstanding balance accrued (for example, in conference with attorneys, the GAL, or teachers), must be paid promptly and in full.

Your understanding of these points and agreement in advance of starting this therapy may resolve difficulties that would otherwise arise and will help make this therapy successful. Your signature at the bottom of this form signifies that you have read and accept these points.
